Please make sure your wiki pages have as few "steps" as possible, as they are so much more difficult to link to and will delay down the line for newcomers to the wiki. The best place for someone to get a job is going to be the homepage of the wiki, and I would advise against creating tutorials or other pages about the dojo/martial art in question or their philosophy. The principle of the website is to be "one page" at a time. Pages shouldn't be more than a couple sentences long. Feel free to create pages in the "Guides" folder for such things, but don't get too carried away with creating a bunch of those. For instance, "How to do a particular technique in X", etc. You can leave the "How to" articles for some of the other pages. Tuesday, March 21, 2014

Shopping Is The Best Way To Deal With Stress, Finds Survey Of course, "only" 9% of people hate shopping. But a survey of 2,000 people found that stress levels are usually higher in the days leading up to a trip to the mall. Stress levels dropped dramatically once people got into the stores. Why is that? Part of it, of course, is that people want to get out of their homes, but the study also found that people want to get to a particular store. One of the most popular things that people want to see when they enter a store is an "assortment." And "assortment" was the most stress-relieving of all the things they surveyed. People who see an assortment of things selected for them were less stressed than those who had to go to the store, find something, and then pay for it themselves. People who buy particular products, like children, are also often less stressed than other adults, according to the survey. So if you're feeling stressed out, there's at least some evidence that shopping for yourself can take the edge off. The present invention relates to a device 82157476af
